Regions 2030+: Building Resilient, Competitive, and Investment-Ready Communities

Regions of the future need a different development framework, built on new forms of leadership, stronger cooperation between the public and private sectors, competencies of the future, and the ability to create development partnerships and investment opportunities. Such a shift will also be crucial for successfully capitalising on the opportunities offered by the European Union's new financial perspective for the 2028–2034 period.

Accessibility is becoming the new development infrastructure: access to knowledge, talent, funding, investment, partnerships, and a high quality of life. A resilient region of the future is built on strong local value chains and openness to the international development environment. How can regions, by bringing together municipalities, businesses, educational institutions, the financial sector, and civil society, create the conditions for new investment, joint development, and long-term resilience and success under the new financial perspective?

Development Framework, New Leadership, Collaboration, and Opportunities for Creating New Business and Project Initiatives.

The event brings together representatives of European institutions, public administration, businesses, financial institutions, universities, development organisations, and civil society to open a discussion on new development models and demonstrate how public-private partnerships, supported by international cooperation, the exchange of good practices, and access to new sources of funding, can become a key competitive advantage for the regions of the future.
